2. citations and explanations (Rule 70.7)

Claims 1-34 and 41-54 meet the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(2)-(4), because the prior art does not teach or fairly suggest the claimed screening methods. While reports of peripheral lipodystrophy, hyperlipidemia, and insulin resistance in conjunction with the administration of antiretroviral (ARV) combination therapies have been noted in the prior art, nevertheless, these reports fail to teach or suggest effective methods for ascertaining which ARVs are likely to adversely impact fat loss and/or redistribution. The prior art fails to teach or suggest screening methods having the precise claim limitations of the instant invention. For instance, screening methods employing the use of mesenchymal stem cells or preadipocytes and assaying for the specific biochemical activities claimed are not disclosed. The shortcomings of the prior art are further illustrated by the lack of availability of suitable animal models in which to predict the adverse consequences associated with ARV therapies.

Claims 35-40 meet the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(2)-(4), because the prior art does not teach or fairly suggest the claimed screening method. Although the prior art discloses that PPAR/RXR receptor/ligand interactions play a role in adipogenesis, the precise effects of various ARVs on these binding interactions and its relevance to lipodystrophy or dyslipidemia in vivo remains to be elucidated. The need for such a screening methodology is further manifest by the various parameters that affect fat metabolism, often in an unpredictable manner. Thus, there is a need in the prior art for assays that detect the effects of ARVs on fat metabolism and provide results that can be directly extrapolated to the clinic.

metabolism, these animals contained single modifications that affect gene expression (i.e., overexpression of a desired gene product). However, the prior art fails to teach or suggest the preparation of transgenic animals, and methods of employing said animals, that express transgenes that confer ARV sensitivity to the animal. Thus, there is a clear need to develop a suitable animal model that will enable the skilled artisan to predict which ARVs will display adverse side-effects.

Claims 62-70 meet the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(2)-(4), because the prior art does not teach or fairly suggest the claimed classification methods. As discussed supra, while reports of peripheral lipodystrophy, hyperlipidemia, and insulin resistance in conjunction with the administration of antiretroviral (ARV) combination therapies have been noted in the prior art, nevertheless, these reports fail to teach or suggest effective screening and classification methods that involve monitoring specific changes in gene expression.
